

I am responding to the argument that LPFM will usurp the inspirational Christian programming currently offered by the current FM translator stations. That's not true. It might, it might not. What WILL happen if LPFM is finally given a chance is that the needs of each local community will be met. If those needs are Christian or inspirational, then LPFM may offer Christian programming that serves the needs of currently-served listeners even better than the current translators! However, if the needs of a certain area aren't Christian but otherwise, then LPFM will allow those needs to be met where currently they are not.

In other words, it's selfish for current Christian programmers to assume that LPFM programming will be anything less than what each community wants - which may or may not be Christian programming.

By the way, I am a Christian... and fully in favor of Christian programming. I just happen to also like the idea of a community being allowed to decide for itself what it wants.

Thanks!
